Chairs R. and L. of table. Newspaper and letters on the table. Dunnbrowne. (without) Well, good morning, my dears, (shows himself in the doorway R.) Don t be away all the morning, and do be merciful in your purchases. (enters R.) Happy is the man who is not troubled with a trio of beautiful daughters, who are incessantly going out shopping. My daughters seem to take a delight in spending my money. I suppose they act upon the principle that, if a thing is worth doing at all it is worth doing well, and as shopping is their chief and only occupation, they strive, and I may add, succeed, to do it as well as any young ladies in this mundane sphere possibly could, (sits R.) I find it of no use whatever to expostulate with them about what I consider their extravagance in dress, for they argue that as they do all the buying and I do all the paying, it is nothing but a right and proper division of labor. Now let me see what trouble has come to me through that prodigious engine of commerce, the post office, this morning. (opens a letter) Another bill from Messrs. Newshape and Whitestraw, the milliners! It is only two weeks since I paid them $25 (looks at the bill) - $37.50 for millinery! Enough to provide me with hats for twenty years, (opens another letter) More bills! This is Mrs. Goodfit s bill for dressmaking: forty dollars, (throws the bill on the table) Oh, this...
